On the banks of streams and miniature lakes, shrubs and evergreen trees are often more desirable than larger deciduous trees, which are apt to make such waters look more insignificant than they really are, while the endeavor should be to produce quite the opposite result by means of judicious planting. When planted in groups, too dissimilar forms must not be brought together in one and the same group; for while diversity is desirable and necessary, there is a limit to contrast over which we cannot pass without making our work disagreeable instead of pleasing. On bare hillsides and sandy, sterile ground, low tufted and spreading shrubs may be used instead of grass for covering the surface, such as crowberry, sand myrtle, crossleaved heath, and purple heather. They are insignificant as individuals and effective in large masses only. St. Johnswort and several plants of the heath family are useful for covering the ground in shady places. A failure is often made in growing ericaceous plants, Vacciniums, Andromedas, and similar forms, simply because they are grown under too artificial conditions. It is generally supposed that these plants require a peaty soil, but in reality they are found growing in rich and damp woods among the common trees, in very ordinary soil, especially in sandy loam covered with a layer of decayed leaves. Many grow in swamps in several inches of water, during the better part of spring and all rainy seasons. A shallow layer of sandy loam mixed with leaf-mould on clay subsoil, in situations where the ground can be submerged...
