

Why Stewardship of Finance?

Generally speaking, ethical, responsible, sustainable finance, all refer to finance as an object that can be qualified one way or other, that is, its actual meaning being restricted in scope through adopting a particular perspective when examining it. That seems to suggest that left to its own devices finance as such will never be acceptable but can be brought into submission if restrained in a sufficient degree. The question of what finance actually is, how it operates and how it fits into the global societal setup is then conveniently left in the dark. What if finance itself had something to say about how it sees its actual role within society as a whole? When I say it I mean of course the practitioners embodying it. Before it became an economic sector in its own right, trading in a commodity called money, and most prominently nowadays, acting as the bookmaker of bets on the variations of prices, when not betting itself with the highest possible leverage, finance was, in a way similar to mathematics being the servant of the sciences, the servant of the economy, providing it with its bloodstream. What if finance came up now with a view of its own on how it should perform the tasks which are specific to it instead of claiming independence and running affairs as it sees fit and in need then of being tamed, subdued one way or other, in order for us in the community to benefit from its operations? -- Paul Jean Maurice Jorion  This booklet contains the lecture given by Paul Jean Maurice Jorion at the occasion of his acceptance of the chair Stewardship of Finance at Vrije Universiteit Brussels. A renowned social anthropologist, Jorion has worked in the European and American financial industry for several years. He writes columns for the economic supplement of the authoritative newspaper Le Monde.
