Not illustrated. 1850 Excerpt: ... When any broad sheet of water, such as the sea, a large river, or a lake, forms the principal object from the front of a house, or from any point in the garden, the value of a good irregular woody foreground, will be even more apparent. A great glare of water is seldom agreeable to the sight; and in some kinds of weather, may be most disagreeable or melancholy. The passage across it of vessels of all sorts, likewise, becomes far more interesting and delightful when it is only to be observed at intervals, and is occasionally lost sight of. If water be looked at through a leafy screen, it is, moreover, in some degree sobered down thereby. It does not dazzle or pain the eye so much. It has all the charm of light and shadow. Its own lustre and loveliness are brightened by the contrast. It is a gem with a dark setting. There may be states of the atmosphere in which a large unfurnished expanse of water will be perfectly satisfactory. On a rich summers evening, towards sunset, or during twilight, especially after warm showers, water may often be in the highest degree beautiful without any accompaniment. But in general, it will either be too glittering or too cold to be altogether satisfying, without some aid from trees as a foreground; and in this changeful and chilly climate, the periods at which its own naked beauty can be entirely appreciated will be of rare occurrence. It is, therefore, wise to provide for common and usual enjoyment, and to leave extraordinary pleasures to be otherwise obtained. The scene that is most pleasing at all seasons of the year will undoubtedly furnish the largest amount of gratification, and make a habitation most cheerful. 10. Nothing imparts a greater air
